Haunted Portsmouth

Wymering Manor in Portsmouth is the oldest building in the city and the most haunted! Cited in the Domesday Book, the manor was reputedly the home of William the Conqueror. Due to its supernatural inhabitants, this grand old place has failed to sell at auction on many occasions.

Wymering Manor has an unbelievable 26 ghosts! On the regular chime of midnight, a group of nuns often stroll across the hall and glide up the stairs. The grand Queen's Room in the building is regularly visited by a young lady known only as Elizabeth, who once resided at the manor. She has been seen on many occasions, holding her baby. The most reported apparition is a presence going by the name of Edward. He's been seen at various times on the building's balcony.

The most chilling and scariest room is by far, the music room. Many paranormal groups have fled it, claiming to have witnessed someone throwing items.

The Sally Port Inn situated in Old Portsmouth, is home to the ghost of the infamous Buster Crabb. In April 1956, Buster spent his last night at this old pub just before he inexplicably disappeared for good. Buster, a British Royal Navy frogman and diver, was hired by MI6 to spy on a Soviet ship docked at Portsmouth Dockyard. Crabb disappeared after diving into the harbour to complete his spying mission.

14 months later, a body dressed in a frogman suit was found floating in Chichester Harbour, minus head and hands. The Government shielded the mission from the public and removed his name from the pub register where he stayed in Portsmouth. Even today, no one knows how, or indeed if, Buster died but his ghost remains sitting at the bar in Sally Port Inn.

Kings Theatre in Portsmouth has become a much-loved site for ghost hunters. The theatre was built during the Edwardian era and is home to 'The Guvnor', the resident ghost. There is much debate over his identity, but many believe he's a former theatre employee. He is frequently observed walking around the theatre wearing his trusted bowler hat.

The theatre also is home to an usherette who confuses many of the customers. She appears in different parts of the building wearing post war attire. When customers approach her she immediately vanishes.
